One of the largest land mammals living today is the Hippopotamus, usually called the Hippo. This huge creature is both a land and water animal, and is so much a part of the water that it will die if it cannot find water enough to keep its skin moist. It is a native of West Africa and has broad distribution through the river systems of the tropical Dark Continent. The name means "River Horse," but scientifically it has no relation to the horse however, but to the hog and swine. There are two species of Hippo. One, the common Hippopotamus, can reach a weight of 8,000 pounds. The other species is the Pygmy, or Liberian Hippo, which is much smaller, attaining a weight of from 400 to 600 pounds. The massive, common Hippo is by far the most numerous, and the pygmy Hippo is quite rare.

There is an old superstition that the Hippo "sweats blood." What actually happens is that the coarse pores of the thick body skin exude large drops of brownish oil, which could appear reddish in the strong sunlight of the tropics. This oil is a protection for the Hippo's skin, sort of a self manufactured cosmetic. It keeps the skin pliable, protects it from the rays of the sun, and is a protective veneer under water.

Generally, Hippos avoid man, and they are thought of as clownish and silly animals. But, they have been known to overturn native boats and attack men in the water. Their immense bulk and enormous, tusked mouth, make them formidable opponents. When their jaws open to the full spread of three or four feet, the powerful grinding, rooting and biting teeth can be seen. The two huge bottom tusks are used for fighting crocodiles and other animals.

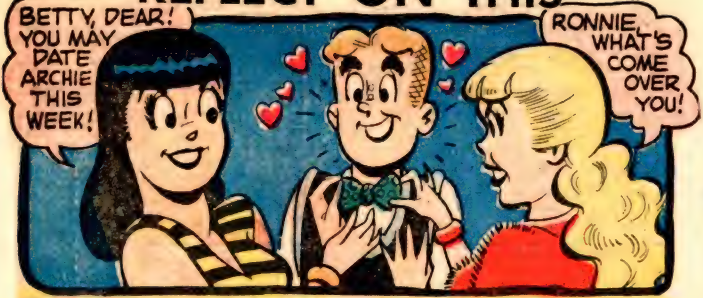
REFLECT ON THIS



BETTY, DEAR! YOU MAY DATE ARCHIE THIS WEEK!
RONNIE, WHAT'S COME OVER YOU!

THERE aren't many girls in this world who, with a boy like Archie on a string, would take off for a weekend, leaving him alone and unprotected in the same town with a Betty Cooper. Even more of a rarity would be a girl who would actually ASK her ARCH-rival (in this case the same Betty Cooper), to look after her boy friend.

Such a girl, you would say, is either an idiot, an angel or a real bona fide pigeon.

As it turned out, Veronica was neither an idiot nor an angel. You can draw your own conclusions.

"What are you going to do with Archie while you're away, Ronnie?" asked Jughead, looking over the pickings in the Lodge refrigerator.

"Put him in cold storage for the two days if I can figure a way," replied Veronica, obviously engrossed with that very problem. "If I don't corral him in some way, that Betty is going to snap him up faster than a hungry turtle with a lazy fly."

Jughead munched contentedly on the roasted leg of what must have been the King Kong of the turkey tribe and watched Veronica wrestle with her problem.

As the gargantuan limb rapidly diminished under the steady, skillful attack, filling Jughead with a feeling of well-being, he condescended to voice an opinion.

"From the scuttlebutt that's making the rounds, I'd say you're barking up the wrong girl. Betty is the least of your problems."

Now Betty being the least of her problems was a completely incongruous thought to Ronnie, and it evoked more than an idle curiosity. Knowing the nature of her informant, Veronica wafted a huge wedge of chocolate cake in front of Jughead and immediately the usually reticent lips opened to release a flood of gossip.

Betty, it seemed, upon hearing of Veronica's king sized worry, had laughed uproariously. Her chances of dating Archie, she claimed, were less than nil. There was a girl in town, she told Jughead, a most completely exotic and beautiful creature, who had Archie's socks rolling up and down like yo-yos. This scintillating siren, whose name she refused to divulge, had more than a passing interest in the freckle-faced redhead too.

Poor Ronnie, pale and shaken, lowered herself into a kitchen chair as Jughead continued to describe in the most glowing terms, the sheer, unadulterated beauty of this fascinating female exactly as he had heard it from Betty.

Slowly, when Jughead had gone and the shock began to dissipate slightly, Ronnie realized that her worries about Betty and Archie had paled into insignificance when compared with this new and far more terrible menace. As a matter of fact, as she delved even more deeply into the problem, she began to awaken to the fact that her former worry was now her only salvation.

From Betty, she could always retrieve Archie, but two days exposure to anyone as disastrously devastating as that creature Jughead had told her about could very easily lead to permanent membership in the Riverdale Knitting, Tatting and Hooked Rug Society.

Thus it was that Archie got the word.

If it wasn't the last thing he expected from Ronnie, it was pretty close to it. It wasn't a request. It wasn't a suggestion. It certainly wasn't a plea.

It was an ORDER.

Archie had followed out worse orders from Veronica than spending every waking moment of a weekend with Betty Cooper. He did his duty as he saw it, with quite a little help from Betty.

The following Monday, as Betty floated to school, the stardust still sparkling in her lovely blue eyes, she was approached by Veronica.

"Well, my friend," commented Ronnie dryly. "I won't ask what kind of a weekend you had because the answer is obvious. But I want you to know that the picnic is over. You've had your fling. The curtain has rung down."

"Wheeee, but what a play," breathed Betty rapturously.

Veronica's lips tightened. "And I want you to know that the only reason Archie dated you was that you represented the lesser of two evils. I just wanted to keep Archie out of the clutches of that new creature you told Juggie about."

"Nothing new about that creature, darling," whispered Betty slyly. "She's been around for years."

"Ridiculous," snapped Ronnie. "I don't know anyone as glamorous as that beauty you were talking about."

"Such modesty," laughed Betty as she strolled off. "You know her very well. Just take a look in the mirror."
